Catching a Boot-Legger.

The term "booze hound" is usually applied to the man who catches boot-leggers; but it had a different meaning the night before last at Bridgeport. "Scrub" Peeler, former well known Alliance man, now city marshal at Bridgeport; his work consists largely of watching the arrivals from the trains which come from Wyoming, for many try to smuggle in booze.

"Scrub" and a state "booze hound" were watching the arrivals get off the Casper train. Among them was a rather elderly man, poorly dressed, who carried an old suit case.

The old man handled the suit case gingerly as though it might contain something that would break. Setting it carefully inside the door of the waiting room at the depot he left the scene, as though afraid to be seen in company with the suit case any more than absolutely necessary.

"Scrub" and his companion immediately scented booze and moved nearer the suit case, keeping their eyes glued on it as though it might get away.

Presently, as they looked, a thin stream of dark liquid oozed from the suit case onto the floor.

"Ah, we've got the goods on the old gent now," said Scrub. "He's bumped the suit case and broken a bottle."

Stepping quickly to the suit case he thrust his index finger of his right hand into the little pool on the floor and tasted it carefully. "That's whiskey," said he. His companion followed his example. "No, that ain't whiskey, it's gin, or something else that's intoxicating," said he.

"Well we'll see which is right," said "Scrub," and they proceeded to open suit case without delay, in full view of the crowd which had been watching them. Inside the suit case there was—and there was nothing else mind you—a pair of hound pups, which gave vent to their feelings of gladness by howls of joy, which mingled with the howls of the crowd, as "Scrub" and the "booze hound" fled down the track murmuring "never again never again."—Alliance (Nebr) Herald, through the Anita (Iowa) Record.
